2024 AmCham Energy Outlook

How far is Europe on the way to a sustainable energy supply, and where is Czechia's competitive fit in that future?

The world has changed around the Czech energy sector. Russia has driven a chasm between itself and Europe. A large number of European countries, and the European Union, have put hard targets on their aim to mitigate climate change. As a result, what once was an economic advantage has turned into a disadvantage for Czechia. Can the government and businesses find a new approach that turns energy back into an advantage, or at least makes it a neutral factor?

At this year's Energy Outlook (September 27, 9 am), Philippe Ducom, president of ExxonMobil in Europe, will describe how Europe is modifying its energy network to make it less dependent both on carbon fuels and Russia. He will weigh whether a new EU Commission will modify their targets and programs for a sustainable economy, and how much (if any). Zsafia Beck of BCG (below left) will suggest the path the EU and its member could take.

They will be followed by Petr Materna of Kearney and David Hajman of CEZ. The two will provide a picture of progress made on transforming the Czech energy mix, and the major steps still to take. Finally, Michal Kupec of Parker Hannifin will present a case study of how his company installed their own sustainable power generation on site. Register for Energy Forum

AmCham 2024 Macroeconomic Outlook

What are the drivers of our future growth?

AmCham executives met with CNB vice-governor Eva Zamrazilová to debate the country’s economic outlook. Inflation has receded as a source of anxiety. Not many businesspeople are convinced that the euro is more than a issue for Sunday debate shows. The real focus is the transformation to a sustainable economy, and how Germany is managing that change. Eric Heymann of Deutsche Bank joined the discussion to give his views from Frankfurt. Ondřej Zabloudil of Deloitte identified key factors influencing the residential market and how those factors might shift. Get 2024 Macro Brief.
